Serial Number:. Download Build-A-Lot IV.Q: How to map objects stored in two different datastores I have a service that reads a mapping table from a third party product (not my choice). We would like this information to be updated with new entities without the need to change our API or its clients. Our current approach is to create a datastore EntityGroup per key, and populate a ContentBlocQueue and BufferedContentQueue for each datastore we support. We then read the table and create a object for each key, and push the object into a Bloc (with the key) and set the group we want to add to. In our API we then use the key to get a reference to the object. From my research I only see solutions where the class to serialize is the same everywhere, so are the mapping tables just a form of serialization? I am starting to think that the Model object we wish to map is limited by the serialization format of the datastore we are using. Maybe I could use entity groups, but I think that is a backwards way of doing it. I am hoping someone can help point me in the right direction. Thanks! A: Are you talking about some sort of key / value store? If so, you could use a putIndex method that puts the key in a serialized object of your choosing, then if the object is in the second datastore you can use deserialization to put the values back in.
